

TYLER HICKS/THE NEW YORK TIMES

LOSING GROUND Ukraine has been repositioning its forces in the vicinity of Avdiivka as Russia deploys new brigades there. Page A10.

Cancer Doctor Is in Spotlight Over Bad Data

By BENJAMIN MUELLER

The stomach cancer study was shot through with suspicious data. Identical constellations of cells were said to depict separate experiments on wholly different biological lineages. Photos of tumor-stricken mice, used to show that a drug reduced cancer growth, had been featured in two previous papers describing other treatments. Problems with the study were severe enough that its publisher, after finding that the paper violated ethics guidelines, formally withdrew it within a few months of its publication in 2021. The study was then wiped from the internet, leaving behind a barren web page that said nothing about the reasons for its removal.

As it turned out, the flawed study was part of a pattern. Since 2008, two of its authors — Dr. Sam S. Yoon, chief of a cancer surgery division at Columbia University’s medical center, and a more junior cancer biologist — have collaborated with a rotating cast of researchers on a combined 26 articles that a British scientific sleuth has publicly flagged for containing suspect data. A medical journal retracted one of them this month after inquiries from The New York Times.

Memorial Sloan Kettering Cancer Center, where Dr. Yoon worked when much of the research was done, is now investigating the studies. Columbia’s medical center declined to comment on specific allegations, saying only that it reviews “any concerns about scientific integrity brought to our attention.”

Dr. Yoon, who has said his research could lead to better cancer treatments, did not answer repeated questions. Attempts to speak to the other researcher, Changhwan Yoon, an associate research scientist at Columbia, were also unsuccessful.

The allegations were aired in recent months in online comments on a science forum and in a blog post by Sholto David, an independent molecular biologist. He has ferreted out problems in a raft of high-profile cancer research, including dozens of papers at a Harvard cancer center that were subsequently referred for retractions or corrections.

From his flat in Wales, Dr. David pores over published images of cells, tumors and mice in his spare

Continued on Page A17

Ethnic Studies Collides With Israel-Hamas War

By DANA GOLDSTEIN

California has grand ambitions for ethnic studies. By 2025, the state’s public high schools — about 1,600 of them — must teach the subject. By 2030, students won’t be able to graduate high school without it.

For policymakers, a goal is to give California students, 80 percent of whom are nonwhite, the opportunity to study a diverse array of cultures. Research has shown that ethnic studies classes can raise grades and attendance for teenagers at risk of dropping out.

But even in a liberal state like California, scholars, parents and educators have found themselves at odds over how to adapt the college-level academic discipline for high school students, especially because of its strong views on race and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

In California Schools, a Clash Over Critiques of Oppression

While the name “ethnic studies” might bring to mind a broad exploration of how ethnicity and race shape the human experience, the discipline, as taught in universities, is narrower — and more ideological.

Ethnic studies focuses on four groups: Black Americans, Latinos, Native Americans and Asian Americans. It aims to critique various forms of oppression and spur students to take action, often drawing analogies across disparate expanses of time and geography. The Palestinian experience of displacement is central to that exercise, and has been compared by some scholars to the Native American experience.

In reworking ethnic studies for high school, California came up with a 700-page model curriculum that captures much of the discipline’s leftist, activist spirit. But it added the stories of other ethnic groups, including Jewish Americans, while eliminating discussions of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. It said lessons should include “multiple perspectives” on political issues.

Now some prominent ethnic studies scholars and educators say the state has bowed to political critics and censored their field. They are promoting a competing vision, which they call “liberated ethnic studies.” It is truer to how the subject is taught in colleges, but more politically fraught. It largely excludes the histories of ethnic groups, including Jews, who are typically understood as white within the discipline’s canon.

Continued on Page A15

MIGUEL MEDINA/AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE — GETTY IMAGES

Perusing antiquarian wares displayed by the booksellers along the banks of the Seine.

Olympic Reprieve for a Living Symbol of Paris

By CATHERINE PORTER

PARIS — Gold-leafed books with engravings, 200-year-old leather-bound books, books so rare and precious they are wrapped carefully in cellophane before being nestled into place inside an antique wooden box set on the Seine’s stony shoulder for students, intellectuals, power brokers and tourists to browse.

Booksellers Had Faced Pause During Games

For centuries, the wooden bookshelves have been a fixture in the heart of Paris, and so when the city’s police, citing security concerns, ordered them closed during this summer’s Olympic Games, an uproar ensued. Now President Emmanuel Macron has stepped in.

In a decision that resounded across the city this week, Mr. Macron deemed the booksellers “a living heritage of the capital” and said they could stay.

The relief was obvious, and not only among the bouquinistes, who had threatened legal action and

Continued on Page A7

NEWS ANALYSIS

Trump’s Scorn For Alliances Isn’t His Alone

Shifting Views of Role of U.S. as World Leader

By PETER BAKER

WASHINGTON — When former President Donald J. Trump told a campaign rally in South Carolina last weekend that he would encourage Russia to attack NATO allies who “didn’t pay,” there were gasps of shock in Washington, London, Paris, Tokyo and elsewhere around the world.

But not in South Carolina. At least not in the room that day. The crowd of Trump supporters decked out in “Make America Great Again” T-shirts and baseball caps reacted to the notion of siding with Moscow over longtime friends of the United States with boisterous cheers and whistles. “Delinquent” allies? Forget them. Not America’s problem.

The visceral rejection of the American-led security architecture constructed in the years after World War II serves as a reminder of how much the notion of U.S. leadership in the world has shifted in recent years. Alliances that were once seen as the bulwark of the Cold War are now viewed as an outdated albatross by a significant segment of the American public that Mr. Trump appeals to.

The old consensus that endured even in the initial years after the end of the Cold War has frayed under the weight of globalization, the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the Great Recession of 2008-09 and Mr. Trump’s relentless assault on international institutions and agreements. While polls show most Americans still support NATO and other alliances, the increasingly vocal objections in some quarters hark back to a century ago when much of America just wanted to be left alone.

“The alliance structure was built to win the Cold War and it’s sort of atrophied,” said Michael Beckley, a scholar of great power competition at Tufts University. “Trump was obviously very jarring when he came to office, but it was part of a long-term trend.” Indeed, he added, “if you look at U.S. history, the last 80 years I really look at as an aberration. Through most of U.S. history, Americans thought they had a pretty good thing going here on the continent and they were largely independent economically of other countries, and

Continued on Page A9

REASSURANCE The vice president wants NATO allies to know the U.S. has their backs. PAGE A9

Sparks Fly as D.A. in Georgia Is Grilled on Her Relationship

This article is by Danny Hakim, Richard Fausset and Michael Levenson.

A case charging former President Donald J. Trump and his allies with trying to subvert the 2020 election results in Georgia took a detour on Thursday into the details of the prosecutors’ romantic and financial lives — their sleeping arrangements, vacations and private bank accounts — in an unusual and highly contentious hearing.

Lawyers for Mr. Trump and his co-defendants have argued that the Fulton County district attorney, Fani T. Willis, and the special prosecutor she hired to manage the case, Nathan J. Wade, should be disqualified from the case because their romantic and financial

ISRAELIS BREACH HOSPITAL IN GAZA THAT WAS REFUGE

DISPLACED FLEE AGAIN

Military Says It’s Seeking Hamas Fighters and Hostages’ Bodies

By VIVIAN YEE

CAIRO — The Israeli military on Thursday raided the largest hospital still functioning in the Gaza Strip, in what it called a search for Hamas fighters and the bodies of hostages. Many people who had sought shelter there were forced to flee from combat once again.

Explosions and gunfire rocked the hospital in the city of Khan Younis, the Nasser Medical Complex, before the predawn raid, killing and wounding several people, including at least one doctor and a patient, according to a doctor there, as well as the charity Doctors Without Borders, which had staff members at the hospital, and Gaza health authorities. The specific casualty claims, like many assertions in the conflict, could not be immediately confirmed.

Videos posted on social media on Thursday and voice messages sent by doctors during the night,

MOHAMMED SALEM/REUTERS

Children in Rafah who were evacuated from the hospital.

both before and after Israeli forces smashed through the perimeter wall and entered the compound, depicted scenes of chaos and fear inside the damaged, smoke-filled hospital, punctuated by automatic gunfire, explosions and shouting.

One video, verified by The New York Times, showed damage to the hospital and injured people being rushed through a smoke-filled corridor among debris amid sounds of gunfire. Witnesses said people by the hundreds — possibly thousands — later stood in long lines as Israeli troops screened them, a few at a time, for evacuation.

The Israeli military said it had detained dozens of people, but did not say who or why.

Continued on Page A8

NATIONAL A11-19

New U.S. Space Satellite Push

The Pentagon put a missile-tracking system in orbit partly to counter threats from Russia and China. PAGE A13

Two Teens Held in Kansas City

Gunfire at the Chiefs’ Super Bowl parade probably stemmed from an argument, the police said. PAGE A16

INTERNATIONAL A4-10

Army vs. Unarmed Volunteers

Some Guatemalans call Belize their 23rd state, a claim that is creating jitters in a lawless region. PAGE A6

Indonesia Wary of New Leader

Prabowo Subianto, who was once under sanctions for rights abuses, has vowed continuity. But will he do it? PAGE A4

OBITUARIES B10-11

The Diva of ‘Diva’

Wilhelmenia Wiggins Fernandez, who rose from Philadelphia to the opera houses of Europe and featured memorably in a 1981 film, was 75. PAGE B10

WEEKEND ARTS C1-14

Playing a Version of Himself

Vince Staples has long shone with his music and on social media. Now, he is the center of a Netflix sitcom. PAGE C9

Justice Long Delayed

An opera staged at Montclair State University tells the stories of people who were wrongfully convicted. PAGE C1

BUSINESS B1-5

Lessons From the Job Market

The pandemic recovery, including a surprisingly resilient employment picture that almost no one expected, has economists wondering whether their playbook is outdated. PAGE B1

Lead Widens for Airbus

The European aerospace giant pulled further ahead of Boeing as it said it would deliver 800 planes this year, including its competitor to Boeing’s troubled 737 Max. PAGE B1

OPINION A20-21

David Brooks

PAGE A21

SPORTS B6-9, 12

Why Goalies Are Struggling

In the cat-and-mouse battle between the N.H.L.’s best shooters and its goal-tenders, guarding the net against top skaters has never been harder. PAGE B6

0 354613 9