

"All the News
That's Fit to Print"

The New York Times

VOL. CLXXV No. 60,770

© 2026 The New York Times Company

TUESDAY, JANUARY 20, 2026

Prices in Canada may be higher

$4.00

FINBARR O'REILLY FOR THE NEW YORK TIMES

The wreckage in Adamuz, Spain, on Monday, a day after derailed cars from a northbound train were slammed by a southbound one.

SPAIN IS STUNNED AFTER RAIL CRASH

High-Speed Catastrophe Leaves Scores Dead

This article is by Jason Horowitz, José Bautista and Samuel Granaodos.

ADAMUZ, Spain — Salvador Jiménez was on a high-speed train to Madrid on Sunday evening, speeding through the arid countryside of southern Spain, when the carriage shook so violently that he thought it had hit an animal on the tracks.

The lights went out. A voice on the public-address system made a plea for medical assistance. Soon the passengers were breaking windows with emergency hammers to escape. Mr. Jiménez, 37, said in an interview.

The collision turned out to be with another train, killing at least 40 people in the deadliest railway crash in Spain since 2013. Two cars at the back of Mr. Jiménez's Madrid-bound train derailed near Adamuz, a town in southern Spain, where they crossed onto the track of an oncoming southbound train, according to a preliminary report by official investigators. Seconds later, at around 7:45 p.m., the southbound train slammed into the carriages and careened down a 12-foot embankment, the preliminary report said.

"It was like an earthquake," said Mr. Jiménez, a broadcast journalist.

The crash left Spaniards in grief and shock, shaking a country that has come to depend, and take great pride in, its sprawling and efficient national rail system, the largest high-speed system in Europe and second-largest in the world, behind China's.

"Spanish society is asking what happened, how it happened, and how this tragedy could have occurred," Prime Minister Pedro Sánchez said at a news media briefing near the crash site on Monday. He said officials would strive to answer the questions about what happened on tracks, switches and junctions that were renovated only in May and with a new train that had been inspected as recently as Thursday.

Neither the privately owned northbound train carrying around 300 passengers or the southbound one operated by Spain's state-owned rail operator was speeding, officials said.

"The accident is extremely

Continued on Page A8

NATIONAL A9-14

Commandments Case in Court

The constitutionality of a Texas law requiring the Ten Commandments in classrooms will be argued. PAGE A13

Testing Tactics in California

Just before President Trump took office, federal agents arrested immigrants using a now-familiar playbook. PAGE A9

INTERNATIONAL A4-8

Snap Election in Japan

Sanae Takaichi, the first woman to be the country's prime minister, is hoping to seize her popularity by calling for a vote next month. PAGE A7

Shifting Vietnam's Economy

After decades of growth, the country seeks to pivot from low-level manufacturing to science and tech. PAGE A7

SPORTS B6-9

Saying Nay to Center Fielders

Since Willie Mays arrived 75 years ago, only two debuting at the position after that are in Cooperstown. PAGE B6

BUSINESS B1-5

Ohio Town Keeps Fighting

The people of East Palestine are still trying to recover nearly three years after a devastating derailment and chemical burn. PAGE B1

Luring Retailers to A.I.

Stores of all kinds are using artificial intelligence to sell everything from luxury handbags to horse hay. PAGE B1

OBITUARIES A15-17

An Eclectic Guitarist

Ralph Towner integrated jazz, classical and world music traditions over seven decades. He was 85. PAGE A15

ARTS C1-6

The Right Way to Make Music

A three-day visit with the Cleveland Orchestra shows that practice is only part of what makes it succeed. PAGE C1

One Actor, Two Villains

With Jack O'Connell, a "Sinners" vampire and a "28 Years Later" cult leader aren't the same kind of vicious. PAGE C1

SCIENCE TIMES D1-8

Formidable Feathers

Filoplumes may be tiny, but these hair-like wonders enable nonstop flights that span thousands of miles. PAGE D1

Debating a Diagnosis

Leaders of "Psychiatry's Bible" are split on whether to recognize postpartum psychosis as a distinct disorder. PAGE D1

OPINION A18-19

Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva

PAGE A19

0 354613 9

THE WEATHER

Today, mostly sunny, breezy, brisk, very cold, high 25. Tonight, clear, cold, low 14. Tomorrow, morning sun, afternoon clouds, not as cold, high 37. Weather map, Page B10.

Trump Links Failed Bid For a Nobel Peace Prize To His Greenland Push

NEWS ANALYSIS

Shoving an Alliance Onto a Precipice

By MICHAEL D. SHEAR

OXFORD, England — What happens to an 80-year-old diplomatic alliance when its leading power threatens a military invasion of one member, wages economic war on the others and vows to cultivate political and cultural resistance to their governments?

Is the alliance doomed?

That question is being asked in capitals across Europe as leaders rush to respond to President Trump's rapidly escalating campaign to acquire Greenland over the objections of the people who live there. At issue most urgently is whether resisting Mr. Trump's territorial ambitions risks damaging Europe's relationship with the United States beyond repair.

Some leaders — like President Emmanuel Macron of France and Lars Klingbeil, Germany's finance minister — appear willing to take that risk, urging Europe's nations to consider deploying an economic "bazooka" in response to Mr. Trump's latest tariff threats.

Leaders from across Europe are expected to gather in Brussels this week to present a unified response to Mr. Trump's provocations. Veteran observers of European politics said the alliance between Europe and the United States that formed in the aftermath of World War II had already been fundamentally altered.

It is no longer an alliance designed primarily to advance the interests of like-minded democracies, they said. Instead, it is a relationship on Mr. Trump's terms alone — one in which he wields the leverage that comes from American power to force Europeans to cater to his whims.

"To use what is essentially economic warfare with allies is unprecedented in this way," said Ian Lesser, who leads the Brussels office of the German Marshall Fund, a research group.

Continued on Page A5

U.S. Needs the Island for Global Security, He Tells Norway

By JEFFREY GETTELMAN and HENRIK PRYSER LIBELL

President Trump is now claiming that one reason he is pushing to acquire Greenland is that he didn't win the Nobel Peace Prize, according to a text message he sent to Norway's prime minister over the weekend.

Jonas Gahr Store, Norway's leader, received the text message on Sunday, an official in the prime minister's office said on Monday.

"Considering your Country decided not to give me the Nobel Peace Prize for having stopped 8 Wars PLUS, I no longer feel an obligation to think purely of Peace, although it will always be predominant, but can now think about what is good and proper for the United States of America," Mr. Trump wrote in the message, which was first published by PBS.

Mr. Trump also questioned Denmark's claim to Greenland, saying, "There are no written documents," and adding, "The World is not secure unless we have Complete and Total Control of Greenland. Thank you!"

The tensions over Greenland have sharply escalated in the past week, and the message injected a new level of uncertainty into Mr. Trump's thinking and his campaign to gain control of the island.

Greenland has been part of the Danish Kingdom for more than 300 years, and world leaders have condemned Mr. Trump's insistence that the United States take over the territory, a giant ice-bound island in the Arctic region.

According to copies of the messages provided by the Norwegian prime minister's office, Mr. Trump's message was a response to one that Mr. Store sent Mr. Trump on Sunday. It was co-signed by the president of Finland, Alexander Stubb, a leader with whom Mr. Trump is close.

The European leaders asked to speak to Mr. Trump about Greenland and his threat of using tariffs to pressure Denmark into selling it, which Denmark has refused to

Continued on Page A6

More on the White House

FED CASE An inquiry into Jerome H. Powell clouds the president's Supreme Court bid to fire a central bank governor. PAGE A12

HOSPITAL CONFLICTS ICE agents being in Minnesota medical centers has prompted some workers to push back. PAGE A11

Last Roar for Albino Alligator in 'City of Misfits'

By HEATHER KNIGHT

SAN FRANCISCO — This funeral traded hymns for a brass band, somber pallbearers for dancing drag queens, and black suits and dresses for reptile costumes. There were no platters of cheese and crackers, but there was a nearly life-size loaf of sourdough shaped like the deceased.

In San Francisco, people do things differently — including the memorial service on Sunday to mourn the passing of Claude, an albino alligator who entertained crowds at the California Academy of Sciences for years by not doing much at all.

Claude has long embraced those who stand out from the crowd, and Claude certainly did. He was pure white, had pink eyes that did not see well, stretched 10 feet long, weighed 300 pounds and was so quiet and still that many first-time visitors to the science museum thought he was a statue.

Continued on Page A10

Continued on Page A