

“All the News
That’s Fit to Print”

The New York Times

THE WEATHER
Today, sun and clouds, warmer, high 76. Tonight, partly cloudy, low 61. Tomorrow, some sunshine giving way to clouds, an afternoon shower, high 72. Weather map is on Page 20.

VOL. CLXXV ... No. 60,901

© 2026 The New York Times Company

SUNDAY, MAY 31, 2026

Prices in Canada may be higher

$6.00

Health workers in Mongbwalu, in the Democratic Republic of Congo, carried the coffin of Sylvestre Atama, a charismatic Catholic preacher, on Monday.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY ARLETTE BASHIZI FOR THE NEW YORK TIMES

Without Much to Hold It Back, Ebola Devastates Mining Town

By DECLAN WALSH
MONGBWALU, Democratic Republic of Congo — In the cramped, dilapidated Ebola ward, a 5-year-old boy languished on a bare mattress, a tissue stuffed into his nose to stanch the incessant bleeding. His father stood over him, eyes clouded with worry. A few beds away lay the body of Christiane Bahati, 21, who had died seven hours earlier but had not yet been taken away. Her shoes were still tucked under the bed, her wailing relatives gathered outside the ward doors. The body, covered by a thin sheet, was highly contagious. Yet hardly anyone in the ward was protected. Relatives came and went, carrying food and water to ailing patients because the hospital had none to give them. A few wore rubber gloves or pulled a scarf across their mouths. Most had nothing at all. In the next ward lay the hospital's laboratory technician, also sick. Seven other hospital workers had already died from suspected Ebola. Few of the staff members had ever been trained to fight the disease, and the most rudimentary equipment was in dangerously short supply: tests, protective suits, goggles, masks, even drinking water. Outside, the sound of hammering broke the hushed silence. Aid workers from Doctors Without Borders were racing to erect isolation tents and disinfection stations. Dr. Alex Bogole, a Congolese doctor in the hospital's intensive care ward, was furious. The virus had been spreading for months, virtually unimpeded, "and this is the best we can do?" he said, the frustration pouring through his protective gear. This is the epicenter of the Ebola outbreak in the Democratic Republic of Congo, and the front line is completely overwhelmed. The Congolese Health Ministry declared the outbreak on May 15, and it has already ballooned into the third largest on record. Two weeks later, the international response is being outpaced by the virus, and there is almost nothing to slow it down. Aid groups warn that without urgent intervention, this could be the world's deadliest Ebola outbreak ever. Dr. Bogole was never trained for this and was angry at every-

Monique Djangusi held a photo of her 21-year-old daughter Christiane Bahati, who died from Ebola in Mongbwalu.

Continued on Page 10

Kyiv’s Civilians Don War Wear To Pay Respect

By DARIA MITIUK
KYIV, Ukraine — On the streets of Kyiv, it can be hard to tell who is a soldier and who isn't. Young men and women in olive-colored, army-style vests and pants walk past camouflage-patterned trucks idling at stoplights. Many of them carry cross-body bags emblazoned with military patches; some bags have tourniquets attached, as casually as keys on a carabiner. Some of these people are veterans or soldiers on leave. But most have no actual ties to the military. They are I.T. workers, university students and other urbanites who have absorbed the visual language of war into their daily dress, a marker of how the conflict has reshaped life in Ukraine's capital. Soldiers and civilians alike call it a show of solidarity, not a shallow trend. "Fashion is a way to show that the army is our new elite," said Artem Vulkovskiy, 30, an I.T. specialist who was discharged from the army in 2023 with a serious hand injury. "This is not about arro-

Continued on Page 6

REUTERS

The Strait of Hormuz last week. Iran has used control of it as leverage against the United States.

Standoff at Sea May Be Test of ‘Who Blinks First’

By NICHOLAS KULISH and JOHN ISMAY

Naval blockades, military history has shown, require patience. That is not the leading attribute of the American commander in chief. So when President Trump imposed a blockade of Iranian ports in April, the quick result he was looking for — a reopening of the Strait of Hormuz to commercial traffic — was not in the cards. Wearing down an enemy with a blockade can take months or years, military experts say, and certainly not weeks. Iran, with thousands of miles of land borders with seven neighbors, and a trade lifeline to its ally Russia across the Caspian Sea, had alternatives. The standoff persisted.

"It's difficult to rapidly bring an adversary to its knees with a blockade," said Michael Connell, a specialist on the Iranian military at the Center for Naval Analyses in Virginia. "It's the kind of thing that works well over time but it's not a quick solution." Now, as the United States appears closer to a peace agreement with Iran, dropping the U.S. block-

Continued on Page 8

The N.Y.P.D. Closes the Book On Handwritten Daily Blotters

By CHELSIA ROSE MARCIUS

On Aug. 29, 1866, a horse-drawn coal cart was clomping along at East Broadway and Chatham Square when a trolley car on the Dry Dock railway line rammed into it, knocking off its 13-year-old passenger and rolling over his leg. It was the start of a busy afternoon for the patrolmen at Manhattan's 19th Precinct. At 4 p.m., two girls found a lost toddler wandering along Cherry Street. That evening, John Connell, a 33-year-old Irish shoemaker, was charged with assault and battery. Those events and millions more have been recorded in police command logs — hard-bound ledgers with daily, handwritten entries that chronicle the city's history through the work of its beat cops. Notes about mundane tasks like roll calls and prison cell checks were, at times, interrupted by pivotal moments: the lead-up to the Civil War draft riots in 1863; the assassination of John Lennon at the Dakota in 1980; the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001. Tens of thousands of logs have piled up like silt on bookshelves and atop filing cabinets throughout New York City's 78 precincts,

TONY CENICOLA/THE NEW YORK TIMES

Most of the N.Y.P.D.'s log books sit in precinct storage rooms.

which still use ledgers nearly identical to the one from 1866. Now this way of record-keeping, one that has spanned three centuries, is ending. The New York Police Department plans to roll out a digital data-input system that will show which officers are on duty, a list of completed tasks and information

Continued on Page 21

INTERNATIONAL 4-13

Germans Are Welcome Now
Amid fears of increased Russian aggression in Europe, Berlin has deployed forces in Lithuania, which once struggled under Nazi occupation. PAGE 4

Return of the Basement Jam
Millennials in Toronto who yearn for a bygone era of dancing that feels more organic are heading downstairs. PAGE 9

METROPOLITAN

Mayor’s Outspoken Lawyer
Ramzi Kassem, the chief counsel to Zohran Mamdani, has strong opinions and vocal detractors. PAGE 8

SPECIAL SECTION

The City’s Best Restaurants
Our critic scoured New York and found an abundance of great places to eat. Here’s a list of the 100 most delectable.

NATIONAL 14-22

Candidate’s Texts Rattled Staff
The wife of Graham Platter, the Maine Democrat running for Senate, told his campaign last year about sexual messages he sent to other women. PAGE 22

An Improved Campus Culture
Jews at Harvard described a changed climate, a sentiment at odds with the Trump administration’s lawsuit. PAGE 15

ARTS & LEISURE

A Show’s Not-So-Live Part
The producers of “Saturday Night Live” offered a rare behind-the-scenes glimpse of a pretape shoot. PAGE 12

SUNDAY STYLES

An Artist Also Looks Inward
It took Joana Avillez six years to illustrate a new edition of “The Bottom of the Harbor” by Joseph Mitchell. It was a Proustian undertaking. PAGE 9

SUNDAY OPINION

M. Gessen PAGE 6

SUNDAY BUSINESS

A.I., Can You Sell My House?
A tech-savvy reporter put his family’s single-largest financial asset in a chatbot’s hands for five frantic days. It was not without anxiety on the human side of the experiment. PAGE 6

After a Match, Fertility Chats
With new fertility benefits, a sisterhood is emerging in tennis locker rooms over discussions of egg freezing as many players look to balance their careers and motherhood. PAGE 1

