

“All the News
That’s Fit to Print”

The New York Times

Mourning After Attack on Gay Pride Event in Berlin
Police officers found a man suspected of killing one and wounding 29. He confronted them with a weapon and was killed. Page A10.

D.N.C.’s Mood Sinks as Cash Grows Scarce

By SHANE GOLDMACHER and REID J. EPSTEIN

The Democratic Party is so short on cash that leaders at its headquarters have undertaken a new gambit to mask the severity of the problems: asking vendors not to send bills until after the midterm elections.

The bookkeeping maneuver, which was described by three people briefed on it, is the latest sign of financial duress for the Democratic National Committee and its embattled leader as money troubles threaten to undercut Democratic momentum with 100 days until the midterms.

So much is going politically right for Democrats these days. President Trump’s approval is down, gas prices are up and an unpopular war with Iran drags on. But dysfunction and debt inside one of the party’s key institutions — which is getting crushed in fund-raising by its Republican counterpart — are creating rising anxiety for top Democrats.

At the center is Ken Martin, the 53-year-old party chairman, who has found himself increasingly isolated, gripped by the fear that he will lose his job and relying on a vanishingly small circle of people he trusts, according to interviews with more than two dozen Democrats, including current and former D.N.C. officials and members. Most of them spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss the party’s troubled state of affairs.

Mr. Martin’s fraying nerves are showing. In a pique of frustration in early July, he threw his phone at the desk of a junior aide while upbraiding the person. The phone-tossing incident resulted in a formal complaint to the D.N.C.’s human resources department.

The fallout from the phone-throwing episode was described by half a dozen people familiar with the incident, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss internal party matters. None of them witnessed the encounter, and there was some dispute over how aggressively the phone was tossed. Mr. Martin was said to have thrown the phone at the desk, rather than at the aide.

Mr. Martin later met with D.N.C. human resources officials about his behavior, according to three of the people.

Continued on Page A15

Seeking Out Taliban Commander I Once Fought

By THOMAS GIBBONS-NEFF

KABUL, Afghanistan — I’ve had a hand in killing around six people. Maybe seven. I don’t know if one man bled out on the side of the road or was taken to a doctor. I think about him often.

The killings occurred in the winter and spring of early 2010, during one of the largest operations of the Afghanistan war: the battle of Marja. I was the 22-year-old leader of a scout sniper team of seven Marines and one Navy corpsman.

Is Closure Possible for a Soldier Who Became a Journalist?

It is a strange thing, having killed people in a conflict that spanned 20 years and was ultimately lost. The sum of such an intense expenditure of human lives and trauma left Afghanistan much as it was in 2001, before any American boots touched the ground.

Killing in war often boils down to an us-or-them mentality, a defensible position common to infantry combat. But we were also directed to “win hearts and minds,” the U.S. strategy meant to earn the population’s trust and isolate the Taliban. Trying to build good will while engaging in gunfights beside people’s homes was profoundly confusing. The killing wasn’t detached; it felt deeply personal.

Patrols required a constant assessment of friend or foe, and long hours staring through high-

Continued on Page A7

IVOR PRICKETT FOR THE NEW YORK TIMES

In Greenland, Seal Hunting Is Life
For centuries, the animal has provided sustenance to people living in a harsh landscape. Page A8.

Kids Pitch In to Rebuild Cities, Using Minecraft

By NATALIE DONBACK

Like many children in Beirut, Georges Zahar grew up playing on the public stairs dotting the city. Then came the 2020 port explosion that killed 218 people and caused up to $4.6 billion in damage, including to the Vendome and St. Nicolas stairs near his home.

After the blast, “there was no life on the stairs, and it was quite trashy,” said Mr. Zahar, now an 18-year-old biology student. “It wasn’t livable anymore and it was hard walking on them.”

Learning Urban Design via Video Game

When he was 14, Mr. Zahar participated in a workshop that used the video game Minecraft to engage children in urban design.

Led by facilitators from the Block by Block Foundation and U.N.-Habitat, he and 45 other children redesigned three of the damaged stairways, dreaming up new features like a big slide, handrails made from speaking tubes, and shaded seating areas, modeling everything out in the game to inform real blueprints.

Since the renovation, the 125 steps that make up the St. Nicolas

Continued on Page A10

BUSINESS B1-5
Pivot From Global Energy
Developing Asian nations, scarred by supply shocks, are working to reduce reliance on imported fuels. PAGE B1

Clashes Over Chinese A.I.
Anthropic and OpenAI are split with the rest of Silicon Valley over access to China’s “open-source” models. PAGE B1

INTERNATIONAL A4-10
Forced to Flee and Wait
In central Spain, thousands of people sleep in shelters or in their cars, some of them evacuated multiple times ahead of advancing wildfires. PAGE A9

The Law-and-Order Candidate
Colombia’s president-elect, a lawyer, has represented accused drug traffickers, among others. PAGE A4

OBITUARIES B6
An Underground Pioneer
Barbara Rubin made the landmark film “Christmas on Earth” and helped bring together pop culture icons. Overlooked.

SPORTS D1-8
Going Higher to Get Faster
A Times reporter’s quest to best his marathon time took him to a Kenyan village a mile and a half high. PAGE D3

Showcase for the W.N.B.A.
Fans in Chicago packed events during All-Star Weekend, reflecting the league’s increasing popularity. PAGE D2

NATIONAL A11-15, 18
Business Ties to Nuclear Energy
President Trump, his family and his supporters could benefit from the administration’s push to accelerate domestically backed power projects around the world. PAGE A13

Allies of Tate Brothers Go Quiet
After Andrew and Tristan Tate, prominent leaders of the so-called manosphere, were arrested in Miami, many of their onetime backers on the right pulled back support. PAGE A14

OPINION A16-17
Joby Warrick PAGE A16

THE WEATHER
Today, partly cloudy, an afternoon thunderstorm, high 83. Tonight, a couple of showers in the evening, low 69. Tomorrow, a heavy storm, high 77. Weather map is on Page D8.

INDUSTRIES FEAR THE DEPORTATION OF VITAL WORKERS

PROTECTION SET TO END

One Million at Risk After Court Ruling, as Some Leaders Try to Act

By MIRIAM JORDAN and MADELEINE NGO

Around Washington, Salvadoran-born crews have helped renovate, rebuild and maintain the Capitol, the Pentagon and Arlington National Cemetery. In senior living facilities in Florida, Massachusetts and New York, Haitian caregivers assist aging Americans with daily activities.

These workers are among more than one million people who have been allowed to live and work in the United States under a decades-old humanitarian program, and who now face the prospect of deportation.

Last month, the Supreme Court cleared the way for the Trump administration to end Temporary Protected Status, as the humanitarian program is known, and now industries are bracing for the loss of vital workers.

About 70 percent of T.P.S. holders were participating in the U.S. labor force, many in construction and health care, according to an analysis by researchers at the University of Pennsylvania.

But on Monday, about 350,000 T.P.S. recipients from Haiti and several other countries will lose their work permits in the first wave of fallout from the Supreme Court ruling. About 190,000 Salvadoran beneficiaries could be next to lose their status when it expires in September.

“For particular places and particular industries, tens of thousands of workers no longer able to legally work is going to be a very big hit,” said Alexander Arnon, the director of policy analysis at the Penn Wharton Budget Model, a nonpartisan research organization that has analyzed the economic impacts of T.P.S. workers.

Economists say the loss of those workers could be gradual, as some pursue other potential protections, such as asylum, and others continue working but off the books.

Still, as the clock ticked toward the end of Temporary Protected Status, business organizations, led by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, mounted a campaign for action on Capitol Hill, joined by a growing number of state and local leaders from both parties.

Continued on Page A12

To Rise in Hegseth’s Pentagon, An Admiral Relied on Politics

By GREG JAFFE and KATE KELLY

Adm. Daryl Caudle saw an opening to land the Navy’s top job last year, and he seized it.

Before Pete Hegseth had even been sworn in as defense secretary, Admiral Caudle, then the head of a major Navy training command, offered to help Mr. Hegseth prepare for his politically contentious Senate confirmation hearing, according to current and former defense officials.

The outreach was a breach of military ethics, the officials said. Senior military officers are supposed to avoid any hint of partisan bias or political activity.

Nothing came of the offer. But soon after Mr. Hegseth took office, he fired the first woman to lead the Navy: Admiral Caudle’s boss. Days later, a senior officer on Admiral Caudle’s staff contacted Mr. Hegseth’s team in another breach of protocol.

ERIC LEE FOR THE NEW YORK TIMES

Adm. Daryl Caudle lobbied for the Navy’s top job last year.

His pitch: Mr. Hegseth should choose Admiral Caudle to be the next chief of naval operations, the current and former officials said, speaking on the condition of anonymity to discuss sensitive personnel matters.

The officer described Admiral Caudle in terms that matched Mr.

Continued on Page A14

ARTS C1-6
Part of the Scenery No More
Kevin Sussman started out with a minor role on “The Big Bang Theory.” Now he has his own zany spinoff, “Stuart Fails to Save the Universe.” PAGE C1

0 354613 9