

“All the News
That’s Fit to Print”

The New York Times

THE WEATHER
Today, primarily sunny, a light breeze, warmer, high 66. Tonight, clear, light wind, low 48. Tomorrow, some sun, then increasing clouds, high 65. Weather map, Page D8.

VOL. CLXXV No. 60,867

© 2026 The New York Times Company

MONDAY, APRIL 27, 2026

Prices in Canada may be higher

$4.00

ANDREW HARNIK/GETTY IMAGES

Security rushed the White House Correspondents’ Association dinner stage on Saturday night as President Trump was evacuated.

Where a Gunman Moved Inside The Washington Hilton Hotel

JONATHAN ERNST/REUTERS

MANDEL NGAN/AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE — GETTY IMAGES

Mike Johnson, top at left, the House speaker, was escorted out along with senior Trump administration officials. Afterward at the White House, the president took questions from members of the media, who were still dressed in tuxedos and evening gowns.

GUNMAN AT GALA SCORNE D TRUMP, AUTHORITIES SAY

Confusion and Fright Among Guests

By MICHAEL M. GRYNBAUM

WASHINGTON — The spring pea and burrata appetizer course had been distributed and the schmoozing hour of Saturday’s White House Correspondents’ Association dinner had begun when a small commotion occurred toward the back of the Washington Hilton ballroom shortly past 8:30 p.m.

It might have been an upturned catering cart, or perhaps a scuffle with protesters. Then security officers began sprinting down the aisles toward the elevated dais, where President Trump, along with Vice President JD Vance and the first lady, Melania Trump, had taken their seats just a few minutes earlier.

There were no announcements or cries of “get down.” Instead, a sense of danger spread across the room like a wave. Hundreds of the country’s top media executives, editors in chief and prominent television anchors, clad in tuxedos and evening gowns, instinctively dropped to the floor, crouching besides chairs and ducking under tables.

A nauseous silence descended, punctuated by small gasps and whimpers. The loudest sounds were those of the security officers racing — and in some cases leaping over chairs and guests — to evacuate senior administration officials from the tightly packed ballroom.

No one had a hint as to what was going on — except that Mr. Trump had been rushed from the stage, which was now occupied by a pair of security officials brandishing large guns. (Later in the evening, officials said that an armed man had charged a security checkpoint and that a Secret Service officer had been shot.)

Erika Kirk, the widow of the conservative activist Charlie Kirk and a guest of Fox News, crawled beneath her table, where she was comforted by the anchor Harris Faulkner and Trey Yingst, the network’s chief foreign correspondent. From beside his chair, Brian Stelter, CNN’s media correspondent, held his iPhone aloft, recording video of whatever scenes were unfolding above.

The health secretary, Robert F. Kennedy Jr., and his wife, the actress Cheryl Hines, looked pained as guards hustled them out.

Others appeared relatively un-

Continued on Page A12

This article is by Luke Broadwater, Shawn McCreesh, Devlin Barrett, Tyler Pager and Maggie Haberman.

WASHINGTON — The gunman who tried to storm a gala featuring President Trump had written angrily about the administration, the authorities said on Sunday as they examined his communications and cross-country movements in the days leading up to the attack.

The episode on Saturday night, at the White House Correspondents’ Association dinner at the Washington Hilton, raised new fears about a scourge of political violence afflicting the United States, and about the safety of one of the most targeted presidents in history.

SALWAN GEORGES FOR THE NEW YORK TIMES

President Trump said that he wanted the dinner to resume.

Shortly before the attack, the suspect, identified by law enforcement officials as Cole Tomas Allen, 31, of Torrance, Calif., sent messages to his relatives denouncing Trump administration policies and suggesting he intended to take violent action, according to a person familiar with the investigation. Other written material found in his hotel room contained similar statements, the person said.

Just past 8:30 p.m. on Saturday, the suspect, armed with knives, a shotgun and a handgun, barreled through security at a full sprint, heading toward the ballroom at the hotel. Many of America’s top government officials and prominent journalists were crammed into the ballroom in tuxedos and

Continued on Page A12

After U.S. Cuts, Zambia’s AIDS-Fighting Network Is Crumbling

By STEPHANIE NOLEN

MPONGWE, Zambia — Saulo Kasekela died of AIDS on March 7, in a small town called Mpongwe in the copper belt of northern Zambia. He was a 37-year-old security guard, admitted to the mission hospital two days earlier. After his body was wheeled out of the men’s ward, a nurse set aside his chest X-ray, a clouded smear of lungs devoured by tuberculosis, a hallmark of advanced, untreated H.I.V. infection. A scrawled doctor’s note indicated the X-ray should be saved for medical students.

Of the eight patients in the ward that day, four had AIDS. Lewis Chifuta, 33, was bone thin, feverish and barely able to recognize his siblings when they reached his bedside.

A year ago in Mpongwe, there was one case like this each month, or maybe two. In January this year, there were 28 new cases; in February, 28 more; in March, seven more.

During President Trump’s first month in office, his administration upended much of the flagship global H.I.V. program that had saved the lives of hundreds of thousands of people in Zambia. The Zambian government went into emergency mode, desperate to ensure that people with the virus could continue to receive life-saving medications.

But other crucial aspects of the program had to be scrapped — interventions that had helped stop the spread of the virus and protected the most vulnerable people, those like Mr. Kasekela.

Today, a pared-down system is operating on reduced U.S. support, and Zambia may lose that help entirely in the next few days. The Trump administration has set a Thursday deadline for the Zambian government to accept a new health funding agreement that is tied to giving the United States expanded access to the country’s mineral resources.

The administration says the deal would offer Zambia five years of funding and help to build a stronger system that gives the country more control. But if Zambia does not sign, officials warn that Washington could cut off all of its H.I.V. aid, a situation health officials here say would be disastrous.

What is happening in Mpongwe now is a grim echo of a time that most of the nurses and clinicians are not old enough to remember. Three decades ago, hospitals in Zambia were packed with young men and women dying agonizing deaths, and the H.I.V./AIDS pan-

Continued on Page A8

ARLETTE BASHIZI FOR THE NEW YORK TIMES

Lewis Chifuta, an AIDS patient in Mpongwe, Zambia. The U.S. is offering funding in exchange for access to the country’s minerals.

U.S. Started War, but Is Spared Tumult Felt by Global Economy

By PATRICIA COHEN and BEN CASSELMAN

LONDON — The fallout from two months of war in Iran is shuttering textile mills in India and Bangladesh, grounding airplanes in Ireland, Poland and Germany, and prompting energy rationing in Vietnam, South Korea and Thailand. The only country, it seems, that has been relatively spared from the economic chaos is the one that started the war: the United States.

While warning signs of a recession are flashing across countries in Asia and Europe, the United States is likely to outperform most of the world’s advanced economies. Growth is steady and unemployment low. “It’s still hard to bet against the U.S. economy,” the Royal Bank of Canada said last week.

The United Arab Emirates, one of the world’s richest countries, with sovereign wealth funds that total more than $2 trillion, has asked the United States for a financial lifeline in the wake of missile-damaged gas fields and a halt to shipping in the Strait of Hormuz.

In just eight weeks — less time than it takes to age a traditional English fruitcake — the global economic outlook has been knocked sideways.

The worst economic pain will be felt in poor countries, where consumers cannot afford higher energy prices, and governments cannot afford to provide aid to offset the costs. And as financing tightens, the cost of desperately needed borrowing for these countries increases.

Soaring prices now for fuel and fertilizer mean higher prices for food later in the year. In Africa, “food insecurity looms large,” the International Monetary Fund said

Continued on Page A6

OBITUARIES A17, 20

Rescuer of Vietnam Refugees

Lionel A. Rosenblatt went on an unauthorized mission to help 200 as Saigon fell in 1975. He was 82. PAGE A17

A Cold-Weather Cameraman

Doug Allan, 74, who worked on David Attenborough’s films, captured candid scenes of many creatures. PAGE A20

INTERNATIONAL A4-9

Mending a Special Relationship

Queen Elizabeth II came to Washington after the Suez Crisis, a fraught moment in Anglo-American relations. Her son is now visiting at a delicate time. PAGE A4

NATIONAL A10-15

Removing Scars of Ink

Free programs offer healing to sex trafficking survivors who have tattoos branding them as property. PAGE A10

Dispute Over Herbicide Harm

A case before the Supreme Court could lead to the dismissal of suits claiming Roundup causes cancer. PAGE A11

BUSINESS B1-6

Fed Inquiry’s ‘Lasting Damage’

President Trump’s attacks on the Federal Reserve have rattled confidence in its ability to operate independently before a leadership shift. PAGE B1

Bringing Airlines Together

A few carriers are making a lot of money while many are struggling. Industry executives and President Trump seem to think mergers may help. PAGE B1

China’s Currency Push

The country’s bid to build a renminbi-based financial system beyond the U.S. dollar’s reach is gaining traction as a way to sidestep sanctions. PAGE B1

SPORTS D1-8

The Best of the N.F.L. Draft

Writers shared their thoughts on the one selection made by each team that appealed to them the most. PAGE D4-5

An Under-2-Hour Marathon

Sabastian Sawe, below, obliterated the world record in London. Yomif Kejelcha also broke the barrier. PAGE D8

ARTS C1-6

A Return Trip to Broadway

“Joe Turner’s Come and Gone” is uneven at times, but it still unlocks August Wilson’s mysterious drama. PAGE C1

Dimming the Movie Screens

Viewers often wonder why today’s films look murkier than films of years past. Experts have some answers. PAGE C1

OPINION A18-19

Michelle Cottle

PAGE A18

