"All the News That's Fit to Print"

The New York Times

THE WEATHER
Today, rain and a thunderstorm early, a thunderstorm later, high 76. Tonight, cloudy, windy, showers, low 51. Tomorrow, decreasing clouds, high 55. Weather map, Page B12.

VOL. CLXXVI .... No. 61,039 © 2026 The New York Times Company FRIDAY, OCTOBER 16, 2026 Prices in Canada may be higher $4.00

When a Scandal Comes, It's the Women Who Exit

Trump's Ouster of Guilfoyle Fits a Pattern

By ERICA L. GREEN

WASHINGTON — The ouster of Kimberly Guilfoyle, who until this week was the U.S. ambassador to Greece, was surprising in its particulars. It was announced on live TV, during the first-ever briefing by the new White House press secretary.

But Ms. Guilfoyle's forced resignation also was part of a larger pattern in President Trump's second term: The prominent figures who have departed the administration, either voluntarily or involuntarily, overwhelmingly are women.

Ms. Guilfoyle was the latest high-ranking woman to leave this year. In the spring, four of Mr. Trump's eight female cabinet-level officials resigned or were fired in just three months: Attorney General Pam Bondi; Lori Chavez-DeRemer, the labor secretary; Homeland Security Secretary Kristi L. Noem; and Tulsi Gabbard, the director of national intelligence.

All were replaced by men.

Ms. Guilfoyle was asked to resign after The Wall Street Journal reported that she had asked a donor to pay off her $100,000 American Express bill before her confirmation vote. Ms. Guilfoyle has denied the allegation. But on Tuesday, Mr. Trump said that while Ms. Guilfoyle "was doing a good job," he "didn't like what I read."

He also downplayed the idea that he had any substantial connection with Ms. Guilfoyle, who is one of the president's staunchest defenders and was at one point engaged to Donald Trump Jr., the president's eldest son. "She wasn't a member of my family," he told reporters. "She, I guess, dated my son a long time ago."

The women in Mr. Trump's orbit do not seem any more inclined to controversy than the men; his male appointees have repeatedly drawn scrutiny and calls for their ouster.

Kash Patel, the F.B.I. director, has been forced to confront questions about his conduct, including allegations of excessive drinking, assigning a SWAT team to protect his girlfriend and using a government plane for his personal use. (He has denied the allegations.)

Commerce Secretary Howard Lutnick surfaced in files released by the Justice Department as one of the visitors to the private island owned by Jeffrey Epstein, the sexual predator. Defense Secretary Pete Hegseth disclosed secret war plans in a conversation on a private messaging app that inadvertently included Jeffrey Goldberg, the editor of The Atlantic.

Mr. Trump did punish one male appointee related to that text chain: Mike Waltz, the national security adviser, who had added the journalist to the chat. But Mr.

Continued on Page A16

MATTHEW ABBOTT FOR THE NEW YORK TIMES

Old Mine Fuels Hopes and Fears
Villagers near a long-closed Papua New Guinea site that holds copper and a painful past. Page A8.

UKRAINE RESUMES REFINERY STRIKES, DEFYING THE U.S.

CHANCING RETRIBUTION

Zelensky Rebukes Trump Over Deal for Diesel: 'It's a Mistake'

By CASSANDRA VINOGRAD and FRANCESCA REGALADO

President Volodymyr Zelensky's anger at the Trump administration burst into view on Thursday when he said he would no longer abide by President Trump's demand to stop striking Russian oil refineries.

It was a remarkably vocal expression by the Ukrainian leader of frustration with the United States, as Kyiv grapples with what it sees as a betrayal by Washington.

Mr. Zelensky's remarks, in an interview with The Financial Times published on Thursday, brought to a head days of mounting tensions with the Trump administration. It drew expressions of support from European allies in Brussels, but could be a risky move for a country that has depended heavily on U.S. support.

In the interview, Mr. Zelensky appeared baffled by Mr. Trump's decisions, criticizing Mr. Trump for making deals with President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia, and for openly admiring dictators who have clung to power. Mr. Putin, the Ukrainian leader said, is "real evil."

"How can Trump be friends with him?" Mr. Zelensky added. "I think it's a mistake."

The Trump administration has long blown hot and cold when it comes to Ukraine. But a new round of friction emerged last week, when Mr. Trump said he had reached an agreement to immediately import Russian diesel fuel to the U.S. market. Ukraine said the move would help fund Moscow's war effort.

Mr. Trump upped the ante on Sunday, unilaterally declaring an energy cease-fire between the two sides and calling for Mr. Zelensky to be replaced. While Ukraine shrugged that idea off, it stopped striking Russian refineries, even as Russia continued to bombard Ukrainian energy infrastructure.

Continued on Page A6

Stream of Gunman's Execution Is Called Off by the President

Families of Victims of Fort Hood Shooting Can View It

This article is by Katie Rogers*,* Tyler Pager*,* John Ismay and Greg Jaffe*.*

WASHINGTON — President Trump on Thursday canceled the Pentagon's planned livestream of the execution of the Army officer who was convicted in the 2009 Fort Hood mass shooting.

Pentagon officials said last week that the execution of Maj. Nidal Malik Hasan, who killed 13 people and wounded 32 others at Fort Hood, Texas, would be broadcast via livestream, a decision Mr. Trump initially said he supported.

But in private, Mr. Trump quickly began to deliberate with his advisers amid widespread criticism of the decision, and learned after the announcement that Mr. Hasan is paralyzed, according to several people familiar with his thinking. The president's main concern was whether broadcasting the execution would deter other mass shootings, according to a White House official who was granted anonymity to discuss his thinking.

In a social media post on Thursday, Mr. Trump said he still believed that a televised execution would be a "strong deterrent for the World to witness how America deals with terrorists and SCUM," but that "many very good and well meaning people would rather not watch him die, through streaming, or through any other visual device."

Mr. Trump added that only immediate families of Mr. Hasan's victims could watch the execution in person.

The president and his advisers remain adamant that Mr. Hasan deserves to be executed, but the

Continued on Page A17

Age 7, at a Deportation Hearing With No Lawyer

Many Migrant Children Are Left to Answer Judges Alone

By JAZMINE ULLOA and MADELEINE NGO

The faces of the six migrant children beamed into a Manhattan courtroom on large screens. All had crossed the U.S.-Mexico border alone. All were facing potential deportation. And none had lawyers.

The minors — five boys and a girl, ages 13 to 17 — fidgeted in their seats, dressed in jeans, T-shirts and sweatshirts, as an immigration judge ran through her script. Where were their parents? Were they afraid to return home? Had they found a lawyer?

At times, a lawyer acting as a court adviser interjected from another screen to recommend that the judge grant the children more time to find counsel. The judge, Lisa W. Ling, pressed ahead, often with little more than a nod.

"Do you want the voluntary departure?" she asked a 15-year-old boy from Guatemala during the September hearing.

"Yes, that's fine," he replied. It was unclear if the boy knew that meant he was giving up on obtaining legal immigration status and agreeing to leave the country.

The scene in Manhattan has been playing out in courtrooms nationwide for months. In Texas, a 7-year-old agreed to voluntarily leave the country without a lawyer present to explain the legal consequences of the decision. In Arizona, an immigration judge ordered a 1-year-old baby appearing without a lawyer to file an asylum application, according to court filings. The baby's mother, a 17-year-old who is an unaccompanied minor herself, appeared with the child in court.

Unaccompanied minors went without legal representation in

Continued on Page A20

Disparate Left Is Posing Test For Mamdani

This article is by Matt Flegenheimer*,* Sally Goldenberg and Liam Stack*.*

If pro-Palestinian activists had designed a New York City mayor in a political science lab, they would have strained to do much better than Zohran Mamdani.

He is the Muslim son of a prominent anticolonial scholar whose childhood home often teemed with leading Palestinian American thinkers, primed since his youth in Uganda and post-apartheid South Africa to connect the pain of Palestinians to liberation struggles around the world.

Galvanizing at a microphone and disarming in person, he has helped guide and expand the Democratic Socialists of America as the Palestinian cause has become a defining D.S.A. focus locally and nationally.

His unwavering denunciations of Israel amid a rise in antisemitic hate have unsettled many of New York's roughly one million Jews, most recently last week when he marked the anniversary of the Hamas-led attacks of Oct. 7, 2023, with a statement that dwelled

Continued on Page A12

Restaurant Favored by Dickens Is Assured Great Preservations

By AMELIA NIERENBERG

LONDON — Some restaurants safeguard part of a city's soul.

New Yorkers have Sardi's, the theater district mainstay where Broadway types have long hobnobbed over stirred martinis and cannelloni au gratin. In Paris, the honor for a time belonged to Les Deux Magots, where generations of writers scribbled, fretted and gossiped.

As for London? One could make a case for Rules, a 228-year-old institution with a game-forward menu, a hearty wine list and antlers on seemingly every wall. Founded by Thomas Rule as an oyster bar in 1798, it has as good a claim as any to being the oldest restaurant in London; its patrons have included Charles Dickens, William Makepeace Thackeray, Ava Gardner and Liza Minnelli.

Now, it plans to keep serving its English fare into perpetuity.

The National Trust, a British charity that protects and preserves the country's heritage, announced Wednesday that it is the new owner of 34-35 Maiden Lane, the building in Covent Garden that houses Rules, and of the restaurant's uniquely ornate interior.

The Trust has been given the site by its owner, John "J-P" Mayhew, who said in a statement that he wanted to ensure the restaurant "and two centuries worth of stories" would be protected forever. The property value of the gift is over £11 million (or about $14.6 million), the Trust said, and the

Continued on Page A5

SAM MELLISH/IN PICTURES, VIA GETTY IMAGES

Rules, a 228-year-old London institution, will be protected in perpetuity by Britain's National Trust.

NATIONAL A11-17, 20

Plan for Universities in Crisis
Schools under scrutiny, such as Cornell, have for decades often followed a sort of public relations playbook. PAGE A13

Fewer Timber Sales Risk Fires
Loggers are finding it impossible to profitably harvest federal forests. That leaves more fuel for wildfires. PAGE A11

INTERNATIONAL A4-10

Book Fray Over Protest Group
Sally Rooney said she could no longer sell novels in the U.K. because of her financial support for a pro-Palestinian group that Britain has banned. PAGE A5

Meta Accused of Bias in Brazil
As a close presidential election looms, President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva and his allies claim Meta is trying to give his right-wing rival an advantage. PAGE A7

Saudis' Struggles With Houthis
Saudi Arabia's military has expensive equipment, but the missiles and drones used by the Yemeni militia are difficult to detect and stop. PAGE A10

BUSINESS B1-6

Reeling From China's E.V.s
Thailand introduced subsidies to spur electric vehicle adoption. Now it is paying the price. PAGE B1

Gulf Oil Flows Despite Attacks
Shipping operators are braving the Strait of Hormuz, but the risks are high and costs have skyrocketed. PAGE B1

OBITUARIES B11

Barrier-Breaking Soprano
Martina Arroyo, 90, a leading star at the Metropolitan Opera in the 1960s and '70s, was one of the first Black singers to have a major stage career.

WEEKEND ARTS C1-10

Black Excellence at Ease
A 1972 gathering of Harlem luminaries held at the home of Duke Ellington is the subject of a new documentary. PAGE C1

Still Inspiring Connections
A survey of the art multitasker Teddy Sandoval is on display at El Museo del Barrio. Below, an untitled work. PAGE C1

SPORTS B7-10

A Delicate Marriage in D.C.
Anthony Davis and the Wizards are saying all the right things, but that doesn't ensure a long-term stay. PAGE B7

A Twice-in-a-Lifetime Moment
A Kentucky football superfan and his daughter got a chance to re-enact a photo they took 19 years ago. PAGE B8

OPINION A18-19

Kate Shaw PAGE A18

0 354613 9