

“All the News
That’s Fit to Print”

The New York Times

THE WEATHER
Today, some sun, drenching thunderstorms, warm, humid, high 84. Tonight, cloudy, humid, low 73. Tomorrow, showers, thunderstorms, high 89. Weather map, Page B10.

VOL. CLXXV No. 60,940

© 2026 The New York Times Company

THURSDAY, JULY 9, 2026

Prices in Canada may be higher

$4.00

President Trump and other leaders gathered for the NATO group photo session on Wednesday at the summit in Ankara, Turkey.

DOUG MILLS/THE NEW YORK TIMES

U.S. Will Let Ukraine Produce Patriot Air Defenses, Trump Says

This article is by Constant Méheut, Nicholas Kulish and John Ismay.

KYIV, Ukraine — President Trump on Wednesday appeared to give Ukraine one of the things it wanted most — permission to produce the Patriot air defense interceptors sorely needed to defend against Russia’s deadly ballistic missile attacks.

Now comes the hard part. The ballistic missiles are raining down on Kyiv now, but the fruits of Mr. Trump’s informal, seemingly impromptu policy announcement may not be ripe for years. Patriot systems are complex and time consuming to manufacture.

It is unclear which Ukrainian company might be selected to partner with either RTX or Lockheed Martin, the two primary defense contractors that produce the Patriot systems, to manufacture the interceptor missiles. Once they have a factory in Ukraine

The Catch: It Could Be Years Before a Factory Is Up and Running built, it would immediately become a high-priority target for Moscow.

These are all problems Ukrainian leaders are happy to tackle. President Volodymyr Zelensky is confident that after four years of war, his country moves more quickly than Western militaries at procurement and production, driven by the lethal threat it faces every day.

Ukraine is racing against time to bolster its air defenses. Mr. Zelensky has warned for weeks that Ukraine is running out of Patriot interceptors, the most reliable weapon that Western allies have given the country to shoot down

Continued on Page A10

Judge Avoids Jail for Effort To Hinder ICE

By MITCH SMITH

MILWAUKEE — In a Milwaukee courtroom last year, Judge Hannah C. Dugan drew the ire of the Trump administration when she was accused of helping an undocumented immigrant evade federal agents.

In a Milwaukee courtroom on Wednesday, Ms. Dugan, a judge no longer, was fined $5,000 but spared prison time, months after a federal jury convicted her of obstructing those agents.

The case against Ms. Dugan, who served on the Milwaukee County Circuit Court, was among the first tests of the Justice Department’s wide-ranging efforts to punish local officials standing in the way of President Trump’s policies. From the start, the prosecution of Ms. Dugan drew the attention and support of high-ranking federal officials, while protesters rallied to the jurist’s defense and decreed the case as a political attack.

In court on Wednesday, Ms. Dugan defended her actions.

“For more than a year, the circumstances of this prosecution have been politicized,” she said before the sentence was announced. “I have been cast as both a scofflaw and a hero. I am neither. I am a public servant who was just trying to do my job.”

At Ms. Dugan’s trial late last year, prosecutors argued that she had crossed a line when she directed an undocumented immigrant appearing before her to leave the courtroom through a side door not used by members of the public. Before doing so, Ms.

Continued on Page A19

‘I thought I was going to die myself.’

GILBERTO CAMEY, below, on discovering the body of his brother Francisco.

VICTOR J. BLUE FOR THE NEW YORK TIMES

Landscaper’s Lonely Death in Wealthy Enclave

By RUKMINI CALLIMACH

In winter, people in the Hamptons know how to protect the things they value. The decorative hedges outside multimillion-dollar homes are carefully wrapped in burlap. Bolts of cloth are unspooled, cut and pulled taut. Then they’re stitched closed by hand with specialized needles, sold in local shops.

That’s because the cold is potentially deadly to some of these plants — when the water inside them freezes, it expands, rupturing the cell walls.

On a sloping patch of ground less than a dozen miles from

No Place to Sleep as a Bitter Winter Fell in the Hamptons

where the wealthy pay to swaddle their bushes, on a day cold enough to freeze a brook running through the woods, one of the men who stitched burlap around hedges disappeared on a Thursday in February.

The last time he was seen, Francisco Casey, 61, woke up on “his” side — the left side — of the enclosure he and his brother, Gilberto, 51, had created under a white tarp by stringing ropes between tall pines in a forest. Francisco headed out at around 9:30 a.m.

That night, the temperature dropped into the low 20s Fahrenheit, and the gusts off Peconic Bay made it feel as cold as 0 degrees. Francisco didn’t return to the shelter. It was still dark when Gilberto woke with a start after feeling an icy breeze, as if someone had pulled back the plastic sheet to enter the tent. “Is it you?” Gilberto called out, but no one answered.

The next day, Gilberto followed his brother’s tracks.

The trail in Riverhead, N.Y., crosses the brook, and then cuts across the side of a forest of tower-

Continued on Page A12

U.S. Bombs Iran Again As Truce Breaks Down; Trump Mulls Blockade

Two Sides Cast Blame for Cycle of Strikes

This article is by Max Bearak, Tyler Pager, Shirin Hakim and Michael Levenson.

American military forces launched attacks on Iran for a second straight day on Wednesday, hours after President Trump said that he believed that a temporary truce he signed with Iran was “over” and called its leaders “scum” and “evil people.”

U.S. Central Command, which oversees operations in the Middle East, said the attacks on Wednesday were intended to further degrade Iran’s ability to threaten ships in the Strait of Hormuz, the critical oil and gas route off Iran’s southern coast.

Iranian state media reported explosions across parts of southern Iran, including in Konarak and nearby Chabahar, two coastal cities east of the Strait of Hormuz, and the sound of warplanes flying over Kish, a small coral island 10 miles off the Iranian coast. A state television reporter said two projectiles had struck Abu Musa, an Iranian-controlled island in the Persian Gulf.

“The United States is holding Iran accountable for recent unjustified aggression against commercial shipping and civilian crews freely navigating a vital international waterway,” Central Command said in a statement.

Mr. Trump, posting on Truth Social, said the strikes were carried out “in retribution” for Iranian attacks on ships this week.

“If it happens again, it will get much worse!” he wrote.

The strikes came hours after Iran fired a barrage of missiles and drones across the Persian Gulf in retaliation for a wave of American attacks on Iranian targets on Tuesday.

With both sides accusing each other of violating the truce and some Iranian media outlets calling for the deal to be torn up entirely, the cease-fire that Iran and the United States signed three weeks ago appeared to be on the verge of collapse. Ship traffic in the Strait of Hormuz had already ground to a halt after the United States accused Iran of striking three commercial vessels in the waterway, reigniting the latest

Continued on Page A9

SLOWDOWN The I.M.F. projected world output growth would fall, a toll of the war with Iran. PAGE B1

MOURNING AN AYATOLLAH In two of Shiite Islam’s holiest sites, Iraqis attended services. PAGE A8

Platner’s Fall Might Just Help Democrats Win Swing State

It’s too soon to say who might replace Graham Platner if he drops out of the Maine Senate race.

But it’s not too early to suggest that his replacement would probably be a modest favorite against Susan Collins, the longtime Republican incumbent.

The same couldn’t be said for Mr. Platner, even before he faced a rape accusation on Monday.

If the race does get a reset, it will be an enormous break for Democrats. Without a victory in Maine, their path to control of the Senate is extremely challenging — not just in 2026, but potentially even if they secure the tiebreaking vice presidency in 2028. It would be an exaggeration to say Mr. Platner was doomed before the latest allegation, but his candidacy was already in a lot of trouble.

To take one example from last week’s New York Times/Siena poll of Maine: Thirty percent of Mr. Platner’s own supporters said his various controversies were making them question whether they could support him.

SOPHIE PARK FOR THE NEW YORK TIMES

Graham Platner has lost most of his allies very quickly.

Although he led Ms. Collins in the poll by two percentage points, it was an open question whether he would be able to withstand another round of controversy — and another round seemed all but inevitable. The extraordinary speed with which Mr. Platner’s loyalists pushed him to withdraw after the allegation Monday is partly a reflection of how badly he was wounded. He was already near the breaking point.

Mr. Platner has denied the rape allegation but said he is

Continued on Page A14

As Parents Reject Vitamin K, Infant Hemorrhages Increase

By MAGGIE ASTOR

When the mother arrived with her newborn, blood oozing from the umbilical-cord stump, Dr. Jessica Kirk and a nurse were alone in a small pediatric emergency room in Florida.

After two decades in medicine, Dr. Kirk, a pediatric hospitalist now practicing in Fairhope, Ala., usually has an idea of possible diagnoses within moments of meeting a patient. But she hadn’t seen this before. As the nurse took vital signs, Dr. Kirk called her medical director.

“Oh no,” she recalled the director saying upon hearing the child’s name. The parents, the director said, had declined the vitamin K injection newborns routinely receive to help blood clot. Without it, infants are vulnerable to spontaneous bleeding.

This baby was hemorrhaging internally.

Within minutes, he was cold, pulse high, blood pressure low, Dr. Kirk recalled. She gave IV fluids, an emergency dose of vitamin K

Continued on Page A18

ARTS C1-6

‘The Pitt’ an Emmys Favorite

The medical series earned 25 nominations, while the final season of the comedy “Hacks” picked up 24. PAGE C1

Movie Night at the Hospital

A British charity group helps patients escape stress and boredom by watching the latest blockbusters. PAGE C1

NATIONAL A11-20

Subpoena Sternly Quashed

A federal judge castigated Justice Department efforts to reinvestigate the 2020 election, noting that it was too late under the law. PAGE A16

How Did the Twins Die?

An anti-vaccination group said twin toddlers had died from inoculations, but a grand jury has indicted their mother on charges of suffocating them. PAGE A18

Trump Told to Pay $5 Million

The writer E. Jean Carroll had asked a judge to order the president to pay the judgment after a jury found he sexually abused and defamed her. PAGE A15

INTERNATIONAL A4-10

‘Business-Friendly Socialism’

Andy Burnham’s time as Manchester mayor may define his pitch to become Britain’s prime minister. PAGE A4

Smashing June Heat Records

Western Europe saw its hottest June in history. Temperatures in some areas are starting to soar again. PAGE A6

BUSINESS B1-5

Intel Shows Signs of Life

It is the centerpiece of President Trump’s drive to make more chips in the United States, but the company still has a long way to go. PAGE B1

THURSDAY STYLES D1-6

World Cup’s Best Dressed?

Which nation has the most stylish fans is unclear, but Sweden seems to lead in the number of horns worn. PAGE D6

SPORTS B6-9

Gauff’s Epiphany on Grass

With tactics that defy conventional wisdom, she has surged to the Wimbledon semifinals for the first time. PAGE B6

Farewell, Nordic Combined

The sport, a part of every Winter Olympics, was dropped from the 2030 Games, which will add freeriding. PAGE B8

OPINION A22-23

Nicholas Kristof

PAGE A23

0 354613 9