

JOHNNY MILANO FOR THE NEW YORK TIMES

LONG ISLAND Digging out in Long Beach. More than two feet of snow had fallen by Monday afternoon in New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island and Massachusetts.

CHRISTOPHER CAPOZZIELLO FOR THE NEW YORK TIMES

NEW HAVEN Drifts filled the parking lot at Yale's Payne Whitney Gymnasium. Connecticut joined several states in declaring weather emergencies on Monday.

LUCY LU FOR THE NEW YORK TIMES

BOSTON Heavy equipment on Charles Street. More than 5,500 flights were canceled, including most at Boston's airports and those around New York City.

GRAHAM DICKIE FOR THE NEW YORK TIMES

BROOKLYN Monday's heavy, wet snow damaged numerous trees and made travel difficult. Delivery services, like DoorDash, were suspended in some sections.

Blizzard Gives Snowy Wallop To East Coast

This article is by Miles G. Cohen, Wesley Parnell, Nate Schweber, Emma Goldberg and Thomas Fuller.

Gray cities turned bright white. Broadway went dark. Students reveled in a snow day. And all but essential traffic was banned across many parts of the northeastern United States.

A powerful blizzard that began pummeling the Eastern Seaboard late Sunday stretched well into Monday afternoon, blanketing an area populated by more than 40 million people and leaving hundreds of thousands of homes without power, including nearly one in 10 customers in Massachusetts.

“I’ve never seen something like this,” said John Brown, 63, a snowplow operator in Massapequa Park, N.Y., who worked through the night to keep roads clear. “As you plow, an hour later you come back, it looks like you were never there.”

The storm was most intense from Maryland to New Hampshire. Snowfall totals in 21 cities and towns across New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island and Massachusetts reached at least two feet by early afternoon on Monday, according to the National Weather Service. More than three feet of snow had fallen in parts of Rhode Island by Monday evening.

On city streets, the storm was treacherous for homeless people. There were more New Yorkers seeking shelter in Penn Station than waiting for trains on Monday morning.

But the beating heart of American capitalism still pumped. Bond traders, stockbrokers and others in the finance industry found a way to make it to work. Jamie Dimon, the chief executive of J.P. Morgan Chase, an outspoken critic of the pandemic-induced work-from-home trend, attended an afternoon meeting in person.

Continued on Page A16

Iran Sees Risk In Giving U.S. What It Wants

By ERIKA SOLOMON

Facing high-stakes brinkmanship as American warships and fighter jets mass off its shores, Iran has refused to concede to President Trump’s demands on its nuclear program and weapons — a stance that has bewildered U.S. officials.

The authoritarian clerics who rule Iran see those concessions — which, in their view, could compromise their core ideology and sovereignty — as a greater threat to their survival than the risk of war.

A dangerous mismatch in perceptions between Iran and the United States is why efforts to negotiate a deal over Iran’s nuclear and military capabilities look increasingly fragile, experts say, and a new regional conflict seems almost inevitable.

“Avoiding war is indeed a high priority, but not at any cost,” said Sasan Karimi, a political scientist at the University of Tehran who served as the deputy vice president for strategy in Iran’s previous government. “At times, a political state — especially an ideological one — may weigh its place in history as heavily as, or even more heavily than, its immediate survival.”

U.S. and Iranian negotiators are struggling to break an impasse over their respective red lines.

The Trump administration says it wants Iran to agree to zero nuclear enrichment to ensure it cannot build a nuclear weapon. U.S. officials have also sometimes insisted on limiting the range of Iran’s ballistic missiles and ending the country’s support for allied militias across the region.

Continued on Page A9

WATCHING Officials are monitoring worrisome signs as President Trump mulls another military campaign against Iran. PAGE A9

Judges Lose Patience on Immigration Defiance

This article is by Mattathias Schwartz, Zach Montague and Ernesto Londoño.

The judge was angry. She had ordered a detained immigrant to be released in Minnesota, but instead he was let go in El Paso, where he had to spend the night in a shelter. All his property was supposed to have been returned, but the government was still holding his identity papers.

“Why should I not hold you in contempt?” the judge asked a Justice Department lawyer at a hearing last week. Instead of answers, she got excuses.

“I don’t think there was ever any intention to defy the court orders,” said the lawyer, Matthew Isihara, a military judge advocate on temporary assignment to the Justice Department. “We were doing our best and things, unfortunately, slipped — slipped through the cracks.”

Trump Administration Lawyers Violating Court Orders

That explanation was not enough for Judge Laura M. Provinzino of the Federal District Court for the District of Minnesota. Last Wednesday, she found Mr. Isihara in civil contempt of court.

Legal experts said her ruling was the first time during President Trump’s second term that a judge had attempted to assert authority by issuing a civil contempt ruling, which enforces a judicial order by imposing a penalty until the offending party complies. In this case, Judge Provinzino ordered Mr. Isihara to pay $500 a day until the identity documents were returned.

But the anger Judge Provinzino flashed at Mr. Isihara has been repeated in courtrooms across the country amid Mr. Trump’s drive to deport large numbers of immigrants. A New York Times review of federal dockets found at least 35 instances since August in which federal district court or magistrate judges issued an order requiring the government to explain why it should not be similarly punished for violating court orders, essentially giving officials one last chance to explain themselves.

Those so-called “show cause” orders came from judges in California, Texas, Florida, Massachusetts, Michigan, New York, West Virginia and Puerto Rico. They all

Continued on Page A15

After Killing of Mexican Drug Lord, What’s Next for His Cartel?

ULISES RUIZ/AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE — GETTY IMAGES

Vehicles were burned in Jalisco State in Mexico on Sunday in response to the killing of a drug lord.

By MARIA ABI-HABIB

MEXICO CITY — One of the world’s most powerful drug lords has been killed, but the question remains whether his death will destroy the organization he built, which slings cocaine, methamphetamine and other drugs from Mexico to the United States and as far as Australia.

Mexican security forces killed the drug lord, Nemesio Oseguera Cervantes, known as El Mencho, the leader of the Jalisco New Generation Cartel, on Sunday.

Almost immediately, Guadalajara, Mexico’s third-largest city and the capital of Jalisco State, was plunged into chaos as the cartel retaliated, with violence spreading to cities and beach resorts across Mexico as gunmen torched stores and banks and blocked highways.

The cartel’s survival depends

Continued on Page A10

INTERNATIONAL A4-10

Ugly Building in Beautiful City
The Tour Montparnasse is one of Paris’s least-loved landmarks. After half a century, it’s being remodeled. PAGE A4

Sex Assaults by Russian Troops
Hundreds of Ukrainian women and girls have reported being raped during the four-year war in Ukraine. PAGE A6

NATIONAL A11-17, 20

ICE Training Called ‘Broken’
A whistle-blower is speaking out with congressional Democrats, who also point to documents showing reduced instruction time for recruits. PAGE A13

‘Burden’ of Basic Living
President Trump says that he has brought down inflation, but families are still struggling to pay bills. PAGE A14

OBITUARIES B11-12

A Savior of Sag Harbor
Theodore Conklin, 77, rehabilitated the American Hotel, turning a Long Island village into a pop star mecca. PAGE B11

BUSINESS B1-5

Did He Save Saks, or Kill It?
Richard Baker wanted to create a high-end retail empire when he combined Saks Fifth Avenue and Neiman Marcus. Soon after, it was bankrupt. PAGE B1

Ad Blitz for A.I. Limits
The campaign was paid for by Public First Action, a super PAC group backed by the A.I. start-up Anthropic. PAGE B1

SPORTS B7-10

From Qatar, Seeking N.B.A.
Abdulla Mousa was invited to an elite camp by the league, which is seeking a hold in the Middle East. PAGE B7

SCIENCE TIMES D1-8

Goodbye to a Melting Glacier
An expedition to study the effect of warming waters in Antarctica ends in disappointment but some hope. PAGE D5

A New Eye on Auroras
At the mountain perch where the northern lights were finally explained, there’s more to explore. PAGE D8

ARTS C1-6

From Sundance to the Village
Tabitha Jackson talks about her new role leading Film Forum and what she will be doing differently. PAGE C1

BAFTAs Crown Their Winners
“One Battle After Another” won best film at the British version of the Oscars. The best actor was a surprise. PAGE C1

OPINION A18-19

Frank Bruni PAGE A18

